

Updating your phone's operating system (OS) is something that most people do on a regular basis. It's also possible to jailbreak or unlock your phone's software, which allows you to install custom apps and ROMs (Read-Only Memory) -but this means it can be harder to find updates for existing apps. One of the things I like about Google Play Store is that they make finding new apps easy; you simply search for "sunshine s-off cracked apk 1579" or any other app that interest you. However, some users found out recently that Google Play Store has been recommending some shady websites in place of legitimate sources of content, not just on phones but also on their laptops and TVs. Android malware is on the rise, which makes it even more important to know where you are downloading your apps from. For instance, you could download what seems to be an up-to-date version of Super Mario Run from Google Play Store only to find you are actually installing a modified version of the game. This is why it's always best to get your apps either directly from the developer or from trusted app stores like Amazon or Google Play Store. The Bad News Earlier this year, many users started complaining that Google's Chrome browser was displaying ads for third-party apps and suggesting they download them on their phones instead of opening the websites directly. When users clicked on these ads to go to the Google Play Store, they were led to sites that looked like the official store but were actually hosted on different domains. The malware that was installed on their phones did not do much damage at first. For example, some apps steal your phone number or your credit card information so they can charge you money in the future. However, attackers are getting more sophisticated with time so it's possible that in the future users could be tricked into installing malicious apps directly from the Google Play Store if they have not updated their operating system or clicked on fake app recommendations. The Good News Fortunately, Google has taken notice of this problem and is working quickly to fix it. It has already removed the offending apps from Google Play Store and has blocked the fake websites that were hosting them. However, you should still be careful when you are installing new apps on your phone or PC. Verify that you are downloading them from the official Google Play Store rather than clicking on app ads. If you suspect an app is malicious, uninstall it right away to prevent attackers from stealing your data or using your phone to send spam messages.
